1. The North Korean National Front for Unification of the Fatherland is organizing a special committee to develop propaganda themes for use in Korea after the armistice. The following propaganda appeals are being considered by the committee:
 - a. To the United Nations: Allow the Koreans to settle their internal differences and withdraw all foreign troops.
 - b. To the Korean People: Form a unification committee with the democratic elements from North and South Korea. Eliminate all war-monger leaders from public service.
 - c. To ROK army officers: Join in the effort to unify Korea.
 2. Political committees will be organized in South and North Korea with elements of South and North Korean legislatures represented and these committees will actively support the formation of a "People's Committee for Unification." This committee will not openly campaign until the exchange of North Korean and ROK prisoners of war has been completed and the so-called "Four Freedoms" introduced. This committee will then campaign for a general election and a coalition government with both North Korean and ROK elements represented. The committee will recommend general disarmament for all Korea.
 3. The coalition government will be heavily infiltrated by Communists. As a sop to ROK elements, the North Koreans will not insist on naming the president but will demand that their men be named Foreign Affairs Minister and Internal Affairs Minister.
 4. The North Koreans plan to return some qualified South Korean political prisoners. These former ROK leaders will be passed off as true representatives of South Korea but will actually be a Trojan horse in the National Assembly newly-elected by all Korea. On the surface, the ROK elements will have numerical control of the National Assembly but at a chosen moment the returned political leaders will show their true allegiance to the North Korean government.
